

Effective Provision of Pre-School Education (EPPE) is the first major study in the United Kingdom to focus specifically on the effectiveness of early years education. The study is a large-scale, longitudinal, multi-site study of children aged 3-5 years in England. It was funded by the Department for Education and the Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC). The study was led by Professor Gillian Triggs and Professor David Brown. The study was published in 2005. The study was a major contribution to the understanding of early years education in the United Kingdom. The study was a landmark study in the field of early years education. The study was a major contribution to the understanding of early years education in the United Kingdom. The study was a landmark study in the field of early years education.